We are essentially a peace-loving Nation. There is probably no Great Power in the world whose soldiers and sailors are so rarely seen upon the streets, and yet there is a latent military spirit in the people, which long years of peace and prosperity cannot eliminate. So in these latter years, since our power has reached out into the four corners of the earth, and met and clashed with that of other nations, that spirit has manifested itself in a widespread interest in our army and navy, and their equipment and fitness to protect our national honor. Our attention having thus been attracted to military armaments, possibly some little discussion of past and present army rifles principally with reference to those used by the United States army may prove interesting and of some profit, especially if a few of the different weapons referred to, are placed before you for inspection. There is here a number of guns, mostly rifles, which illustrate roughly the evolution of the military rifle since the American Revolution. But a few preliminary words, briefly showing the growth of the use of gunpowder and the gun, and some of the inventions connected therewith, may be interesting. The introduction of gun-powder into Central Europe was...
