For both entitlement communities and state grantees, there are more grantees that gain ten percent or more than lose ten percent or more. This is because overall, larger grantees lose more than they gain (and thus there are more dollars to spread to a greater number of smaller grantees). Of the 100 largest entitlement grantees, 61 percent have decreases in funding. The redistribution of funds is primarily driven by changes in entitlement communities share of persons in poverty and overcrowded households. This shift in relative share on these variables results in a regional redistribution of funds where entitlement communities and states in the West gain funds while communities and states in the Midwest, Great Plains, and Puerto Rico lose funds. Generally, the other regions of the country have stable funding levels overall, but central cities within regions lose funds while suburban cities and urban counties experience funding increases. Swapping Census 2000 for Census 1990 data on pre-1940 housing has a relatively small impact on the overall redistribution of funds. Nonetheless, as was the case with introduction of 1990 data, communities demolishing pre-1940 housing continue to lose funds to communities that are maintaining or renovating their pre-1940 housing. Updating Population and Growth Lag, and Addition of New Entitlement Communities The remaining two variables of the CDBG formula, population and growth lag, are updated whenever the U. S. Census Bureau publishes local area population estimates. These updates are introduced approximately every 2 years during the course of the decade. In addition to causing generally minor funding shifts during the course of the decade, the new population data are used to identify cities and counties that have attained a high...
