Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from A Course in Normal Histology, Vol. 1: A Guide for Practical Instruction in Histology and Microscopic Anatomy The brilliant progress made in microscopy during the last three to four decades has gradually brought with it a total change in the course of histologic instruction. In former days the student himself prepared his own microscopic specimens with razor and needle and with the aid of a few solutions for maceration, hardening and staining. To-day, after recognizing the inefficiency of such methods, this work has almost entirely been taken from the student's hands. Instead he receives from the assistant or preparator more or less immaculate specimens, preserved, cut and stained; some only for a single observation, others as his property. The practical course has been replaced by one of demonstration; at any rate in all its essential phases. Special courses have been designed for instruction in the technique of microscopy, with the result that such courses have but a minimum percentage of attendance. By far the majority of our students enter the clinical semesters without being...
