Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from The Soul of America: The Contribution of Presbyterian Home Missions In these days of crowded libraries every new book should be able to give a reason for its existence. This then is not a full history of the Christian missions of America, nor even a full account of the Presbyterian share in that great enterprise. It is an attempt to outline the missionary adventure in two respects. First, to trace home missions as an organization from the time when the germ of it was in a small Committee with indefinite powers to this latter day of enlarged tasks and increased opportunity. In the second place, to show the development of the work of home missions from the time when it was the outreach of a feeble hand of help to settlers on the borders of a great wilderness to this day, when it comprises many new departures, yet all on the stock of its original charter. The hamlet in the wilderness has become a great city and calls for help for all its congested and imperilled multitudes. The Anglo-Saxon message of the first century must now be translated into forty tongues and must be adapted to forty various inheritances and conditions. John Eliot's message to aborigines must be enlarged to take into consideration physical, social and tribal peculiarities. The gospel preached to primitive country people must be united with community service that will arrest the moral and intellectual decline which solitude has enforced.
